INTRODUCTION

The items that comprise the Wanka Collection reflect the late Wilhelm Wanka's interest in the fate of the Germans who, after World War II, were expelled from what was known as the Sudetenland. The Sudetenland was never a specific geographical or political unit but rather was a name derived from the Sudeten Mountains located in the northeast part of Czechoslovakia. Until 1919 the term was usually understood to mean the German parts of northern Moravia and of the portion of Silesia that belonged to Austria. After World War I, Bohemia, Moravia, and Austrian Silesia became part of the new Czechoslovakian republic and the name Sudetenland came to refer to all the German parts of Czechoslovakia. These were located mainly along the borders with Germany and Austria, but there were also concentrations of Germans in other parts of the country. These Germans were not newcomers. They had lived there for centuries and, in 1914, like their non-German neighbours, had been part of the Austro-Hungarian empire for several hundred years. After World War I the border previously separating Austria-Hungary from Germany separated Czechoslovakia from Germany and a new boundary separated Czechoslovakia from the new Austrian republic. For Czechs and Slovaks this change was cause for rejoicing because it marked the fulfillment of their dreams of nationhood. To the more than three million Sudeten Germans, however, it represented the trampling of their national rights.

After the defeat of Austria-Hungary Sudeten Germans expected and wanted their territories to become part of Austria or some other German state. Indeed, even before the peace conference had come to a settlement, local leaders set up provisional governments which they hoped would become part of larger German jurisdictions. However, the Czech National Committee, which had received Allied recognition as the basis for the future government of a Czech republic, took over in Prague, sent Czech forces to occupy the Sudeten areas, and presented the Allies with a fait accompli. There was little resistance, since most Germans assumed that a plebiscite would soon follow. After all, the right to national self-determination had been one of the ideals for which the Allies claimed to have fought the war. But there was no plebiscite and, though the boundaries of Czechoslovakia were not actually decided until the Treaty of St. Germain-en-Lay was signed on 10 Sept. 1919, Sudeten Germans were not allowed to participate in the elections for the first parliament of Austria. In protest, their leaders called meetings on 4 March 1919, the day that parliament met for the first time. The Czechs responded with a show of force, firing into crowds, killing 52 and wounding 84. This was hardly an auspicious beginning for the new state.

Nevertheless, the Sudeten German social democrats, until now part of the Austrian social democratic movement, intended to accommodate themselves to the new situation. At a special congress held 30 August to 3 September 1919, they founded their own party, the Deutsche Sozialdemokratische Arbeiterpartei in der Tschechoslowakischen Republik (DSAP), i.e. the German Social Democratic Workers' Party in the Czechoslovakian Republic, whose name emphasized their identification with the republic and reflected their intentions. The fact that the party received 43.5% of the Sudeten German vote in the election of 1920 suggests that many Germans were becoming reconciled to their position, although they were far from satisfied. They resented the fact that the constitution did not grant them the status of a Staatsvolk, i.e. a constituent nation, although they were the second largest group in the republic, while the Slovaks, in third place, were so honoured. Czech language policies, land reform, and the increase of Czech officials in German areas led to further dissatisfaction, while the Great Depression hit the Sudeten areas particularly hard, since they were more industrialized than the rest of Czechoslovakia. The organization which benefited most from this growing disaffection was the Sudetendeutsche Partei (SdP), founded as the Sudetendeutsche Heimatfront in 1933 by Konrad Henlein, who had achieved prominence in the German gymnastics movement, which, like the Czech Sokol, mixed sport with patriotism.

One reason for the SdP's success was that it was established in the same year that the Czech authorities banned the other German nationalist parties, the Deutsche Nationalsozialistische Arbeiterpartei (DNSAP) and the Deutsche Nationalpartei. The former had originated in 1904 as the Deutsche Arbeiterpartei in Österreich and become the DNSAP in 1918. It advocated the union of all Germans, but had nothing to do with Hitler's National Socialists or their racial policies. Nevertheless, its name made it seem a threat. The Czechs also suspended the Deutsche Nationalpartei and annulled the seats it currently held in parliament and the senate. Such measures exacerbated German discontentment and provided ammunition for anyone seeking to prove that the Czech government was oppressing Germans. Henlein took advantage of the opportunity, while repeatedly declaring his loyalty to the republic and his attachment to democratic principles and insisting that he wanted only autonomy for Sudeten Germans within the Czechoslovak republic. He was very convincing and persuaded even the British of his good intentions. In fact, he regularly received aid and instructions from Hitler, which he managed to keep a secret. Shortly before the election of 1935, the Czech authorities informed the organization that a Home Front did not conform to the definition of a political party and it would have to change its name in order to participate in the election. It now became the SdP as a result of what could be presented as another instance of Czech bullying. The SdP thus was the likeliest recipient of the protest votes of disgruntled Sudeten Germans. Moreover, its campaign, like the one waged by the Nazis in Germany, appealed to bigotry and disillusionment by blaming Jewish socialists and corrupt politicians for the economic hardships the Sudeten areas were suffering. This allegation constituted a direct attack on the DSAP which continued to cooperate with the Czechoslovakian government and whose chairman, Ludwig Czech, was a Jew. Hitler's success at wiping out unemployment in Germany helped to convince voters that Henlein was right, while the SdP's anti-Marxism made it attractive to Sudeten German employers. As a result, the election gave the SdP 44 seats in parliament and reduced the DSAP representation from 21 to 11.

During the next few years, Henlein gradually revealed his Nazi connections, while the social democrats tried to recover their strength. In 1936, Wenzel Jaksch of the DSAP, Hans Schütz of the Deutsche Christlich-Soziale Volkspartei (Christian Social People's Party), and Gustav Hacker, of the Bund der Landwirte, (Farmers' Federation), formed the Jungaktivismus (Young Activists' Group) which hoped to save the republic by gaining economic and cultural concessions for Sudeten Germans. Their successes were extremely modest and whatever promise they held for the future was destroyed by the Anschluß of Austria to the German Reich in March of 1938. This led to panic and the DSAP's allies abandoned it and threw in their lots with the SdP. Only the DSAP remained loyal to the government. Jaksch, who had become party chairman in May of that year, and his secretary, Willi Wanka, travelled to London to seek support for the endangered Czechoslovakian republic. Although they made friends who would later help them organize the rescue of comrades from Czechoslovakia after the annexation of the Sudetenland by Germany, Jaksch and Wanka returned home without having achieved the purpose of their trip. The British government wanted to settle the Sudeten question peacefully and Henlein, who was also in London, was able to gain sympathy for his demands for autonomy for minorities in Czechoslovakia. Under pressure to make concessions, therefore, the Czechoslovak government entered into negotiations with the SdP, gave Henlein what he wanted, and also agreed henceforth to deny the DSAP any cabinet posts. Hitler, of course, used the Sudeten issue to justify his expansion eastward and orchestrated violence in the Sudeten areas to justify his demand that they be ceded to the Reich or there would be war. Thus, on 29 September 1939, France, Germany, Britain, and Italy signed the Munich Agreement by which they agreed that Czechoslovakia, which had had no representation at the meeting that decided its fate, must hand over the Sudetenland to Germany.

The agreement was to come into force on 1 October and on that day the DSAP released all its members in the Sudeten areas from loyalty to the party. Jaksch and Wanka then left for London to seek aid from sympathetic acquaintances and, when Jaksch returned to Prague, he left Wanka to organize a relief effort. An appeal succeeded in raising £225,000 to rescue refugees from Czechoslovakia, where thousands of Germans had fled when the Nazis occupied the Sudetenland. Few countries would accept refugees, but Denmark, Norway, Finland, Sweden, and Britain were prepared to take some, as long as their presence was temporary and they would find more permanent asylum elsewhere. Canada agreed to provide such a haven and over one thousand Sudeten Germans emigrated there in 1939. By the time Hitler invaded Czechoslovakia in March of 1939, two thousand Sudeten Germans had managed to leave. The DSAP, knowing that a German invasion was imminent, dissolved its organization at a meeting of the executive in Prague on 22 February 1939 and resolved to continue in exile as the Treugemeinschaft sudetendeutscher Sozialdemokraten. A faction of the party, led by Ludwig Czech, opposed this decision because they saw no reason to disband when there were still members in Czechoslovakia. Of course, the party was doomed, as were any members who did not escape, including Czech himself. He insisted on staying, even after being offered a Dutch visa, and died in Theresienstadt in 1942.

In Britain the Treugemeinschaft now undertook to protect the interests of Sudeten Germans and ensure that a post-war settlement respected their rights. But the Treugemeinschaft's claim to be the representative of the Sudeten Germans was weak because most Sudeten Germans supported Henlein and even a majority of those who did not support the SdP had no objection to incorporation into the Reich. Not surprisingly, therefore, most Czechs considered all Germans to be members of a hostile minority and German social democrats found to their dismay that when they sought refuge in unoccupied Czechoslovakia they were likely to be deported into the waiting arms of the Gestapo. Even if they were allowed to stay, they were regarded with suspicion and distrust. For many social democrats such treatment constituted a betrayal and strengthened the nationalist orientation that had already manifested itself in Jaksch's election as party chairman. Jaksch had no desire to restore the Czechoslovak republic as it had existed before the Munich Agreement, but insisted that the Sudeten Germans be allowed to exercise the right to national self-determination which had been denied them in 1918. At the very least, he wanted some kind of federal system. For him and his supporters, the Treugemeinschaft was the representative of the Sudeten German people. For this reason, Jaksch opposed Sudeten German enlistment in the Czech Legion. He believed that Sudeten German social democrats had to fight with the knowledge that they were fighting both for their people and for peace. Also, if they joined the Czech army they might end up fighting their own comrades to restore a Czech state.

Not all members of the Treugemeinschaft supported Jaksch's position. The most important group of opponents, known as the Zinnergruppe, was made up mainly of former trade unionists and led by Josef Zinner, once head of the miners' union. The group's leaders had been supporters of Ludwig Czech, who had been more internationalist in outlook than Jaksch and had not approved of Jaksch's involvement in the Jungaktivismus. Now the dissenters criticized Jaksch's increasing nationalism and the substitution of sudetendeutsch for Arbeiter in the party's name. They also accused him of betraying Marxist principles, establishing contact with Otto Strasser, a socialist Nazi, and allowing anti-Semitic influences in the party. The Zinnergruppe also objected to Jaksch's failure to support unquestioningly the goals of the Czech National Committee, the Czech government in exile. Zinner and his supporters were in constant communication with the Czechs and declared their unity with the Czech people at whose side they were fighting. They were to find, however, that their loyalty did not earn them a place in the new Czechoslovakia. Like most Sudeten Germans, they would be forced into exile once more, this time permanently, because it was the Czech solution to the Sudeten question that won the approval of the Allies.

As the war progressed, the Treugemeinschaft's position became weaker. Jaksch's willingness to consider the separation of the Sudeten areas from Czechoslovakia made it impossible for him to cooperate with Edvard Beneš, the Czech president, while growing hatred of all Germans made Jaksch's position suspect. The British government accorded the Treugemeinschaft no official recognition and Nazi atrocities, in particular the destruction of the village of Lidice in 1942 in retaliation for the assassination of Reinhard Heydrich, Protector of Bohemia and Moravia, reduced the stock of sympathy available for any German group. Beneš, on the other hand, had, by the fall of 1942, gained official recognition of his committee as the Czechoslovak government and British repudiation of the Munich Agreement. He and his ministers thus had public support and access to the media, particularly radio, which they used to incite violence against the Germans. It was, therefore, Beneš's plan, namely the expulsion of the German population from Czechoslovakia, that was eventually carried out. In this way, he hoped to ensure that the presence of a large German population could never again become the cause of or the pretext for German expansionism. In spite of early public statements declaring that most Sudeten Germans were not Nazis or traitors, but had been duped by Henlein, Beneš and his Minister of State, Hubert Ripka, had always considered some kind of population transfer to be advisable. At first, only those Germans who had come to Czechoslovakia since the Munich Agreement would be expelled. Then war criminals, Henleinists, Nazis, and their supporters were added to the list and, finally, by 1944, it was clear that the vast majority of Sudeten Germans would be expelled. By this time, the Allies had also agreed to such a transfer and, when they met at Potsdam in 1945, they declared that all Germans in eastern Europe would be expelled to the post-war German state.

Germans began fleeing eastern Europe early in 1945 as the German army retreated westward and Sudeten Germans joined refugee groups from Silesia. By May, however, the Czech authorities were organizing mass expulsions and issuing decrees depriving all Germans, Hungarians, and other “traitors” of their civil rights. German property was confiscated, German schools were closed, Germans were forbidden to use public transportation and frequent places of amusement, they had to wear armbands identifying them as German, they were fed “Jewish rations,” and were not allowed to receive money from any source. They were put to forced labour in mines, on farms, and in factories and housed in appalling conditions. Many were imprisoned in concentration camps and social democrats, some of whom were Jews, who had managed to survive years in Nazi camps now found themselves in Czech ones. Czech hatred of Germans ensured that the new regulations were frequently enforced with considerable brutality and also led to looting, massacres, rapes, lynchings, and other atrocities. By 1948 more than sixteen million Germans had been expelled from Eastern Europe. More than three million of them were Sudeten Germans. For the Czechs, the Sudeten question had been solved, but for the refugees it had merely been transformed.

For many Sudeten Germans the loss of their homeland continues to be of central concern, even though they have become well integrated into German society, because they see it as an injustice that has never been properly acknowledged. They persist in trying to bring it to the world’s attention and some continue to ask for compensation for their losses, the restoration of their homeland, and the recognition of the right to national self-determination. Most Sudeten Germans would probably be satisfied with an acknowledgement that their treatment constituted a grievous transgression against human rights. As they have pointed out, the expulsion of people from their homes and the confiscation of their property are violations of human rights despite the sanitized language of the Potsdam Agreement which declared that this transfer of populations would be carried out “in an orderly and humane fashion.” The removal of a population from its homeland against its will, even if orderly, is inherently inhumane, regardless of who carries it out. However, in this instance, as in most others, history is written from the perspective of the victors and the horrors perpetrated by Nazi Germany have made it almost taboo to depict Germans as anything other than villains. To raise the subject of the expulsions, therefore, is to invite controversy, indignation, or indifference.

Dealing with the Sudeten question is difficult for Germans because any show of sympathy leaves them open to accusations of neo-Nazism, of failing to feel sufficiently guilty for the crimes of the past, and even of harbouring ambitions of restoring their lost territories. Moreover, the Germans who have grown up since World War II tend to regard anything that smacks of nationalism, particularly German nationalism, with suspicion. For the German government it is an issue that disturbs relations with those countries from which the refugees came. For the Czechs the expulsion of the Germans appeared necessary for the achievement of a national state and thus for them it was nothing more than, in the words of Radomír Luza, “merely part of a vast redistribution of population which took place at the end of the war.”* In his eyes as well, the Sudeten German organizations which ask for recognition of the Sudeten Germans’ right to their homeland are tainted by pan-Germanism, revanchism, and Nazism, demonstrated in particular by their refusal to denounce the Munich Agreement. To cast any doubt at all on the necessity and fairness of the expulsion of the Sudeten Germans would thus be to tarnish the Czechs' image of themselves as innocent victims of Nazi aggression. As a result, the expulsion of the Sudeten Germans, which was probably the most traumatic and important event of their lives for the people who suffered it, is topic that almost no one wants to discuss.

For Willi Wanka the Sudeten question never lost its importance. Although he became a Canadian citizen in 1946, came to regard Canada as his home, and took an active part in community affairs, his interest in the fate of the Sudeten Germans never wavered. The Wanka Collection is the result of this interest and is a valuable source of information on the history of Sudeten Germans, their activities since World War II, and the issues and controversies which have divided them. The books include works on the history of the DSAP and of Czechoslovakia before World War II, the history and politics of Europe since the war, and the expulsions of Germans from Eastern Europe, as well as biographies, remembrances of life in the Sudetenland, poetry, and folklore. This library is not, of course, a complete collection of material on these topics, but it is substantial and provides not only information but also an insight into the mind of the man who collected it. The pamphlet files supplement the books with publications by various Sudeten German organizations and essays and articles on issues which have led to debate among Sudeten Germans. The correspondence files, comprising photocopies of original documents that will be transferred to the National Archives of Canada in Ottawa, contain letters written and received by Wanka from 1939 until his death in 1992. These files, together with the Sudeten-Bote, which Wanka edited from its inception in 1965 until 1992, permit the close examination of Wanka's own views, the controversies which divided Sudeten German social democrats both in Europe and Canada, and Wanka's relationships with Jaksch and other Sudeten Germans.

SUDETEN GERMAN SETTLEMENT

These photocopies are a selection of the material in Files 1 and 2 of the original documents and one report from File 3. They deal with the emigration of Sudeten German refugees in 1939.

Wanka went to London, England, in October of 1938 soon after the Munich Agreement of 29 Sept. and became the London Representative of the Sudeten German Refugees in which capacity he organized the settlement of 1,054 refugees in Canada in 1939. One group settled in Saskatchewan and one in British Columbia, the latter of which Wanka, his wife, and his brother and sister joined.

SELIGER-GEMEINDE

Deals with Wanka's relationship with the Seliger-Gemeinde, the Sudeten German Social Democratic organization in West Germany founded in 1951 as the successor to the Treugemeinschaft sudetendeutscher Sozialdemokraten which had succeeded the Deutsche Sozialdemokratische Arbeiterpartei in der Tschechoslowakischen Republik. The S-G was named after Josef Seliger, the first chairman of the DSAP and its first leader was Wenzel Jaksch. The Treugemeinschaft's primary goal had been the solution of the Sudeten question that was based on the right to national self-determination. The Seliger-Gemeinde still demanded that Sudeten Germans be granted this right, but it vowed to work toward the establishment of a European federation based on that principle and the strengthening of German and European socialism. It was not a party, but rather a Gesinnungsgemeinschaft, an organization open to all those in sympathy with its goals, and its members belonged to the social democratic parties of their respective countries.

ARBEITSGEMEINSCHAFT CZECHOSLOVAKISCHER SOZIALISTEN

Deals with the Arbeitsgemeinschaft czechoslovakischer Sozialisten, organized in Sweden by dissident members of the Treugemeinschaft, though not intended to be restricted to Sweden. It was made up mainly of Sudeten German trade unionists and led by Josef Ladig, secretary of the Metalworkers' union, and Franz Krejci, a textile worker, DSAP secretary, and former member of Czech parliament. The group concerned itself with the future of the unions in whatever Czechoslovakian state was organized after the war. Like the Zinnergruppe in England, the AcS supported Beneš, the restoration of Czechoslovakia as it was before the Munich Agreement, and the enlistment of Sudeten Germans in the Czech army. It opposed the increasing nationalism of the Treugemeinschaft, considered the term Sudeten German a Nazi invention, and preferred Deutschböhmen and Deutschmährer because these terms identified them as citizens of Czechoslovakia. The AcS also identified itself as part of the international working class and retained the establishment of socialism as its goal.

Ständiger Ausschuss für Senioren- und Sozialfragen [Seniorenreferat] - 5 files

In April of 1988 the German-Canadian Congress established a Standing Committee on Seniors' and Social Issues [Ständiger Ausschuss für Senioren- und Sozialfragen, also referred to as Seniorenreferat]. The committee's first priority was to assist German-Canadians in applying for pensions under the Agreement on Social Security between Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany. Willi Wanka was the first chairman of the committee.

SUDETEN SETTLEMENT IN CANADA - 4 Files

Wanka proceeded to London, England, a few days after the Munich Agreement of 29 Sept. 1938 and became the London Representative of the Sudeten German Refugees in which capacity he became involved in the settlement of 1,054 refugees in Canada in 1939. One group settled in Saskatchewan and one in British Columbia, the latter of which Wanka, his wife, and his brother and sister joined.

SUDETENDEUTSCHER RAT

Deals with Wanka's relationship with the Sudetendeutscher Rat, a Sudeten German organization, based in Munich. Its purpose was to coordinate efforts of the individual Landsmannschaften with those of the political parties in Germany and to fight for the right of Sudeten Germans to their homeland based on the right to national self-determination.
